Cultural memories are not stable and fixed structures. Quite the contrary, they are constantly on the move. Memories change over time and space and switch from one medium to another. In these globalized realities, mediated views of the past become quickly shared, remediated and eventually interpreted differently around the world. Images of wars and catastrophes, such as photographs of napalm attacks in Vietnam, televisual news from 9/11 or footage from Syria in the social media quickly become globally recognized symbols. However, they do not remain untouched. Artists, news agencies and internet users share and combine them with other images and texts. Consequently, they shape dynamic and constantly developing views of the past that need to be adjusted to local contexts. Memories never stop. They keep traveling and changing.
